

finding when his jacket and shirt were off, the animals were less shy of him, he resolves to go so, till the weather obliges him to put them on again.

Having picked up a sufficient quantity of off-sets to stock about two acres of land, he returns home, then fixes upon a spot of ground near his habitation, and digs it up as well as he could with his wooden instrument, in order to sow his seed; which having compassed in about twenty days, he implores a blessing upon his labour, and leaves it to time to bring forth. Thus having finished the work about his barrack, he resolves to take a more particular view of the island, and taking a long staff in his hand, he walks to the lake, which parts the land from the rock, and goes along the side of it quite round the island, finding all the way new subjects for admiration, some parts of the rock resembling ramparts of an old fortification; other parts challenging a likeness to a city, and clusters of houses, with here and there a high steeple standing above the other buildings.

As he was walking, admiring all the wonderful works of nature, he happened to sneeze opposite to a place in the rock, which hollowed in after the manner of the inside of some church, church, and was answered from of different voices issuing from. Immediately he sung several psalms with as much devotion as if he were in the company of a number of skilful and devout choristers. Having spent a considerable time there with much pleasure, in his walk, being resolved to make a place of worship for the future, a twice a day constantly.

About three or four hundred paces he was stopped again by the surprising nature, a large stone growing out of the rock, representing a sea horse, out of whose head issued a fountain of exceeding sweetness as milk: But what surprised him more was, the basin into which the fountain emptied itself, as thick as his wrist, had no visible outlet, emptying itself. Having been round the fountain, which to the best of his judgment was about five miles in circumference, he resolved the next day in viewing the inside of the church to bed pretty early.

In his sleep he fancied himself in the interior of a temple, at the upper end of which stood on a magnificent throne, sat two female figures, the one he thought represented Peace, the other Plenty, having rested
